The traditional Chinese calendar, which specifies the date of the Lunar New Year, is lunisolar, which means it is based on the moon cycle as well as on the Earth's course around the Sun. The month in this Chinese calendar lasts 28 days and the normal year lasts from 353 to 355 days [source: timeanddate.com]. To keep the calendar in sync with the sun and seasons, the Chinese add an additional leap month roughly once every three years [source: timeanddate.com]. Determining the date of the Chinese New Year requires some complicated calculations. In most cases, it falls on the second new york after the winter solstice. In the Gregorian calendar, the solstice is around December 21. Therefore, the Chinese New Year usually occurs at the end of January or during one of the first three weeks of February. The years of the Chinese calendar follow a 12-year cycle. Each year is associated with one of the 12 symbols of animals such as tiger, rabbit and dragon [source: timeanddate.com]. Each new year marks the end of the reign of one animal and the beginning of the next. For example, 2012 was the year of the dragon, 2013 was the year of the snake, and 2014 was the year of the horse. It is believed that persons born under the sign of an animal have characteristics associated with it. According to these beliefs, the people of the year of the dragon are proud, confident and direct; those who were born in the year of the serpent are wise and creative; horse people are joyful and intelligent [source: absolutelyfengshui.com]. The Chinese calendar was once widely used in Asia, and Lunar New Year versions are celebrated in other Asian countries. In Vietnam, for example, the holiday is called Tet. It is a three-day celebration that includes many customs that are observed in such as holidays of special food and respect for ancestors. Japan and Korea have long used the Gregorian calendar, but people in these countries include some of the same customs in their New Year celebrations on January 1. Many individual days of the Chinese New Year are of particular importance. We'll look at that on the next page.
